

This moment has never happened before.

Not in this exact way. Not with the same people, not with the same thoughts, not with the same conditions.

And yet... it feels familiar.

That's because time doesn't just move forward in a straight line.

It echoes.

Think about seasons.

Every year, we experience summer, fall, winter, spring.

They repeat – but never exactly the same way.

Each cycle carries similarities, but also differences.

So time feels like repetition... but also like change.

What I'm exploring in 'TIME: Unwinding the Spiral' is this idea

What if time doesn't move in a straight line and it doesn't simply loop in a circle...

but instead moves in a spiral?

Imagine a spiral

It revisits the same positions

But it also moves forward or outward

That means

History doesn't repeat exactly

But patterns reappear in new forms

We see this in

Culture

Fashion

Politics

Even personal growth

You might face the same kind of challenge in life...

but you're not the same person anymore.

So the real question becomes

What direction does time move toward?

If it's a straight line, it has a clear beginning and end.

If it's a circle, everything repeats endlessly.

But if it's a spiral...

Then time is doing both at once:

Revisiting the past

While progressing into something new

So instead of asking: Are we moving forward or repeating ourselves?

We ask: How are we evolving through repetition?

'TIME: Unwinding the Spiral' is an attempt to:

Visualize time not as a line or loop

But as a layered, expanding motion

Where every moment is both new and connected to what came before

So maybe time doesn't move toward something in a straight direction...

Maybe it moves through itself; revisiting, reshaping, and redefining the present.